Unlawfully withholding medication can have serious legal consequences, often stemming from a breach of the standard of care or violation of patient rights. When a physician withholds medication without a medically justifiable reason, it may constitute negligence or malpractice.